

Spark_Exercise2_TweetRead

January 2, 2022

This program use the Tweepy library to get the tweets from Twitter API using Python and passes them to the Spark Streaming instance.

First, we set up our Twitter credentials to have the authorization to take tweets from it. Next, we will create a TweetsListener, which is a class that inherit from the StreamListener class, and it would be responsible for the streaming itself. For initialization, we provide a socket object and implement two methods : on_data and on_error. The first method is responsible for receiving data from the Twitter stream and sending it to a socket. The second is used for receiving error messages and printing it.

Then, we connect to Twitter streaming by using the sendTweets method which will have a socket object as a parameter and create a stream object instance.

Finally, to start streaming, we create a socket object, obtain the local machine name which is '127.0.0.1', reserve a port for your service on the host, bind to the port, wait for a client connection which would be from the streaming notebook and call sendTweets method to build a new connection, and here we will pick all the tweets containing the covid and newyear tag.
